P3 panel discusses challenges in hospital projects

ANGELA GISMONDI STAFF WRITER

ow the parties involved in two public-private partnership (P3) hospital projects faced challenges and persevered was candidly discussed at a recent national P3 conference.

The breakout session, Back from the Brink: The Resiliency of the P3 Model, was part of the annual Canadian Council for Public-Private Partnerships conference held in Toronto.

Panellists focused on the Oakville-Trafalgar hospital project in Oakville, Ont. and the Milton District Hospital in Milton, Ont., both of which faced challenges just before or just after opening.

At the Oakville hospital, there was a loss of all access control in the building shortly before opening day, with thousands of doors and security controls affected. Furthermore, just a few months after the hospital opened, one of the dampers froze shut causing heating coils to blow, flooding 14,000 square feet of space.

In Milton, there were a series of smaller events that caused the accumulation of failure points, including problems with the help desk operator and failure in the sewer system of the building.

"We had a number of significant calamitous events in the building," explained Bill Bailey, senior vice-president, redevelopment and facilities, Halton Healthcare Services.

"You can commission a building, you can do all the testing that you possibly want to undertake, but it's the building itself, when you start running the building, that's really going to tell you if there are some significant issues and they will reveal themselves to you."

Instead of defaulting on the contract, the parties worked together to find a solution.

"As we encroached on the threshold of failure in the contract we took action together to intervene and developed a process together to rectify the situation. What that entailed is undertaking an operational review because we believe that a lot of the problems manifest themselves from work-related issues that couldn't be perceived ahead of time," said Bailey.

The $13.1-million, 46,285-square-foot, two-storey facility located on King Road in King City, Ont., will replace the current municipal building which has been located in a strip plaza on the same road for decades.

"Part of our design requirement was to consider King's heritage but also to try and design a building that was both modern and a nod to the heritage features of the township and I think we accomplished that," said Chris Fasciano, director of parks, recreation and culture at the Township of King and the liaison between the township and the general contractor.

He added the township had outgrown the old facility and the new facility will meet the demands of the growing population.

The building will be the new administraive centre, bringing all the township's departments together. The goal is for all staff to be in the new offices for the Dec. 3 inaugural meeting of the new municipal council.

Economy at a Glance

Prepared by Alex Carrick, ConstructConnect® Chief Economist

Electricity's rise to prominence: a compelling story with many chapters still to be written (Part 3)

Continued from Economy at a Glance, Vol. 14, Issue 91. Nor is an immediate end to this trend apparent. Map 1 shows the primary fuel source used for power generation in each U.S. state.

Along the three coastlines, power generation is dominated by natural gas, hydroelectric and nuclear. Many of those states have already taken the difficult step of shifting away from coal.

Power generation in the vast middle of the country, however — with the exceptions of South Dakota and Illinois — is still mostly dependent on 'black gold'.

In the 18 states with dark gray shading (for coal), there is strong potential for capital spending on alternative means of power generation.

Map 2 is for the provinces of Canada and only in Saskatchewan and Alberta is coal still king in electricity production.

What has all of this meant for the construction sector?

For starters, there has been strong activity in either converting existing power generating units from coal to natural gas, or in the building of new natural gas-fired stations.

There has also been a need for expansions to pipeline capacity. Mega pipeline projects — to service residential, commercial, industrial and power plant customers — have become more prominent in ConstructConnect's starts statistics.

Alex Carrick

I promised some surprises at the end of this tale about electric power generation.

Since the election of Mr. Trump as President, there has been an emphasis in Washington's energy policy approach to restore a measure of vitality to the U.S. coal industry. Therefore, the switchover from coal-fired power plants to natural gas and 'renewables' may not proceed at the same rapid pace as once expected.

Even more of a shock, though, has been the recent trend in electricity usage. From 2001 to 2007, electric power consumption in the U.S. skyrocketed. Nearly everyone, from stock market analysts to energy experts, expected that pattern to continue.

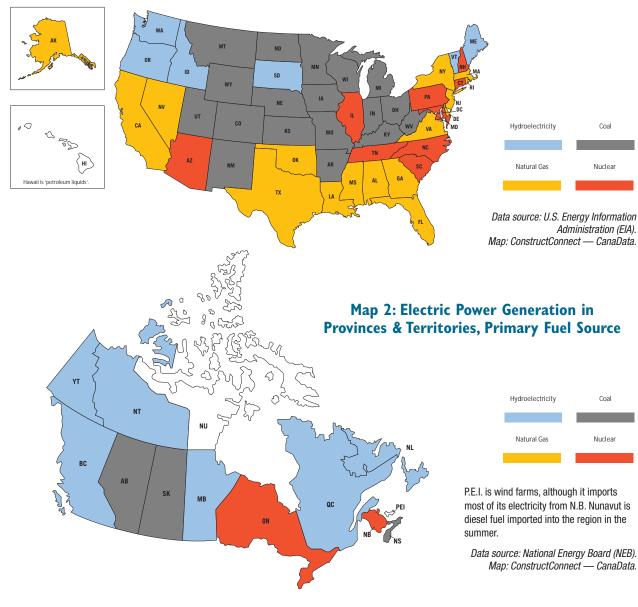

But prodigious conservation measures, undertaken willingly by homeowners and businesses and built into electronic devices and appliances, have restrained the growth of demand.

Graph 7 establishes a leveling off in U.S. electricity demand that has now gone on for a dozen years.

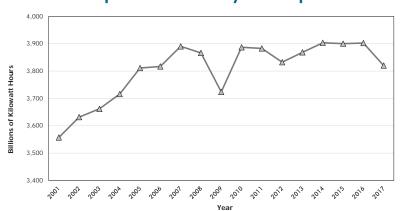

For now, this is where the saga leaves off. One thing is certain, though. There will be many more chapters written in the years ahead.

What the private sector provides municipalities hile municipalities do provide some private-type programs and services to their residents, most municipal programs and services are very different in nature from what the private sector can provide.

For instance, some municipal services (e.g., city streets and parks) constitute public goods, meaning not that they are good for the public, but rather than they are non-excludable and nondepletable. Often goods of this character are even of benefit to non-users. Goods of this nature cannot be provided by the market on a fee-for-use basis because they are non-exclusive, and thus everyone has incentive to a free ride on others.

As a practical matter, services of this kind cannot be dispensed with, nor is it practical to attempt to contract around them. Other municipal suppliers lack the element of rejectability. For the most part, there is no practical alternative to the municipal water supply; there is no alternative to city sewers.

Some municipal programs or services straddle the line between public and private goods. Policing serves as a case in point. Basic policing services, law enforcement and the maintenance of public order appear to meet the test of public goods.

However, increased security levels that protect only specific private facilities (e.g., shopping malls, office buildings and entertainment areas) place an excessive drain on community policing and can be serviced on an excludable basis.

So, for instance, private protection services, such as private security guards and even detectives, are supplied as private goods. The service offered is excludable, rejectable as described above. Nevertheless, due to their own particular needs, some consumers are often prepared to pay a high price for such extra services.

Municipalities also provide some programs and services that constitute merit goods. These are goods that could be provided to a segment of the public on a userpay basis and thus could be provided by the private sector, but which are for some public policy reason considered necessary to afford universal access.

Examples often offered by municipal governments include on-the-job work training programs, public libraries, citizens' advice bureaus, inoculations for flu and the like. Goods of this nature are provided on a public subsidy basis in order to make them universally accessible. Public transit is often presented as a good of this type.

Procurement PerspectivesStephen Bauld

Another class of municipal services and programs may be described as collective goods or social goods.

These are goods that are allocated on the basis of the criterion "to each according to his needs" and are financed through taxation on the basis of the criterion "from each according to his ability."

Social housing is an example. Housing is obviously property that can be made exclusive, simply by putting a lock on the door. Thus, a substantial part of the housing stock is provided by the private sector.

Social housing, by definition, is housing that is provided to people who cannot afford to purchase housing in the open market. The argument for the provision of social goods by government is at least as old as Christianity, and (as the description of the term suggests) is also to be found in the writings of Marx.

However, the modern justification is essentially that provided by John Dewey: "Our social affections are direct interests in the well-being of others; their cultivation and expressions is at one and the same time a source of good to ourselves, and, intelligently guided, to others.

"Taken in this light, it is sympathetic emotion imagination which make the standard of general happiness not merely the 'desirable end' but the desired end, the effectively working object of endeavour."

The portion of the cost of social housing that cannot be paid for by those who live in social housing is passed on to the taxpayer.

Stephen Bauld is a government procurement expert and can be reached at swbauld@purchasingci. com. Some of his columns may contain excerpts from The Municipal Procurement Handbook published by Butterworths.

Consortiums work quickly to solve problems amidst contract obstacles

"I saw a whole spectrum of what can go wrong but I also saw what worked. You need to have a strong and capable owner side team to manage the project. They are complex, there are a lot of decisions. Once financial close is reached, the pace of the project cannot be underestimated."

Angela Clayton, group head, buildings division with Plenary Group, which was responsible for the Milton hospital project, told delegates that post substantial completion, the consortium found itself in a situation where it was quickly accumulating failure points and reporting default.

"We had a decision to make — do we want to proceed with the default and get into a position where we are disputing with Halton Healthcare Services as to whether or not a default exists, or do we want to help them achieve their objective of getting the hospital to a point where it's meeting operational requirements? We chose the latter," said Clayton.

"We entered into an agreement and ultimately we are in a better position and created a strong relationship because of it."

While overcoming challenges with these projects did work out in the end, going through the process was difficult at times, said Joey Comeau, senior vice-president of capital services with EllisDon Corporation. He spoke specifically about the flooding at the Oakville Hospital.

"With any flooding event, the period of time that it takes to remediate a flood and to get it back to the same level of availability as it would have been otherwise just requires time. In these contracts, you have a punitive contract—the clock was running and we were there trying to fix it," he explained.

"We were able to quickly, in a very short period of time, identify what the cause of the problem was and make sure it wasn't going to occur again. The actual fixing of the issue wasn't necessarily the key challenge for us. The key challenge was more...we had incurred a number of failure points and essentially we had gone into default, where if the client had wanted to they were in a position where they could have put us into default on the entire contract."

Joey Comeau, senior vice-president, capital services with EllisDon Corporation, and Angela Clayton, group head, buildings division with Plenary Group, spoke about the challenges they encountered while working on public-private partnership hospital projects in Ontario during a discussion at the Canadian Council for Public-Private Partnerships conference in Toronto. The session was billed Back from the Brink: The Resiliency of the P3 model.

He agreed with other panellists the main challenge was resolving the issue, especially with so many parties involved.

"On one hand, we're trying to make things right with our clients. On the other hand, we have all those other stakeholders that you have these open conversations with about their liability or their risk profiles changing or something else is changing in the nature of their contract," said Comeau.

"Frankly, what we found interesting when this all happened is the actual fixing of the issue was a couple hundred of thousands of dollars but the final price tag was just short of $5 million. If that's what the P3 market creates and talk about being on the brink, as you can imagine, it's very difficult to go back to a position of profitability."

Another challenge was the insolvency of Carillion PLC in the U.K., as Carillion Canada was part of the consortium on the project.

"We now had no one to point the finger at in terms of who was actually going to solve all these issues other than ourselves, regardless of if it was a construction defect issue, a service provider issue at the end of the day, because we took the position that we were 100 per cent liable," said Comeau.

"There were a lot of the questions. What we really wanted to do was calm the market. I remember for a month consistently delivering the message 'EllisDon is going to be there."

Joint-use facility provides services under one roof

Construction was delayed by almost a year due to a local developer appealing the project to the Ontario Municipal Board, explained Jason Ballantyne, the communications officer for King.

Once that hurdle was cleared construction proceeded. The building was in the planning and design phase for about 14 months and took about 14 months to construct.

"The starting message was that we needed a building that was functional for today and tomorrow, a building that had more capacity to build space into it if we needed to," explained Fasciano. "The community gymnasium is a versatile space that serves a purpose today but could serve a different purpose in the future if it needs to. We talked about the need to have enhanced customer service areas and a building that had to incorporate sustainable features.

"Based upon our evaluation, it could meet LEED Gold if we went through the certification process."

The project manager is Colliers Project Leaders and Aquicon Construction is the general contractor. The architects and prime consultant on the project are +VG Architect; the mechanical and electrical engineers are Jain Consultants; the civil engineer is Counterpoint Engineering; the structural engineer is Stephenson Engineering Ltd.; and the landscape architect is Snow Larc Landscape Architect. The team for the design, build, bid contract was selected through a public request for proposals process.

"A joint-use facility with police is a unique feature as well as having the community gymnasium in it," said Fasciano.

"On top of that was for us to have an integrated customer service element. Right now, you have to go to the different departments to do your different services. At this location there will be integrated customer service now, one stop shopping so you can do everything from pay your taxes to buy your garbage tags to do your program registration."

The site is the former home of Holy Name Catholic Elementary School. The township purchased the land from the separate school board and fully demolished the buildings on the site.

"It wasn't viable to be reused due to the different ages of the two buildings, the way they connected to each other, as well as two buildings, the way they connected to each other, as well as the construction type — low ceilings, issues with the mechanical systems," explained Fasciano.

The total cost of the project including land acquisition is $21.5 million and it will be financed using infrastructure and development charge reserves as well as proceeds from the former municipal office. York Regional Police also made a capital contribution.

The building features wood and glass elements, including a glass stairway to the second floor of the building, which allows as much natural light as possible into the building and provides expansive views of the property.

"The front of the building has a wood canopy that bridges between the exterior and the interior, and goes into the council chamber as well," said Fasciano. "The exterior is a combination of brick, wood and wood panelling."

Staying true to the township's focus on the environment, the new building will feature a number of sustainability features including an electric vehicle charging station, a geothermal heating and cooling loop system, reforestation of some of the land and incorporating sustainable building materials and mechanical systems in the building.
