Innovation drives frenzied change in tech sector

Colorado Tech directory highlights growing industry

JEFF NUTTALL
PUBLISHER

Technology continues to change at a frenzied pace. Innovations in aerospace, ag tech, bioscience, clean tech, computing, energy, health care, the Internet, software and other areas create an exciting time for business and individuals.

Equally frenzied is the pace at which the tech sector is expanding in Colorado, from the ag-tech and computer hotbed of Northern Colorado to the Internet and software sectors of the Boulder Valley, from high-tech clusters in downtown Denver and the surrounding metropolitan area, to Colorado Springs' growing tech sector, technology jobs are in abundance in Colorado.

Tech helps drive the state's economy, and national and global media outlets regularly report on the state as a growing alternative to Silicon Valley, Boston or other established tech havens.

Boulder gave birth to Techstars, an accelerator that has developed a global brand with hundreds of companies having gone through the immersive entrepreneurial experience. Colorado seems to add another incubator or accelerator at every turn. Startup Weeks have emerged in Boulder, Colorado Springs, Denver, Fort Collins, Longmont and Loveland, providing a chance for cities to showcase their innovative and entrepreneurial cultures.

Denver Startup Week not only has enjoyed record crowds but also ranks as the largest free entrepreneurial event of its type in the country.

And as Dallas Heltzell reports in this edition of Colorado Tech, 16,000 tech businesses added 6,700 new jobs in 2016, with 196,651 workers in tech-related fields at the end of 2016 — about 7.8 percent of the overall state workforce.

Those trends and more are why the Colorado Technology Association teamed with BizWest Media LLC — publisher of BizWest, a business journal covering Boulder, Broomfield, Larimer and Weld counties — to produce this third edition of Colorado Tech. This publication highlights the industries and trends that constitute the state's technology scene, including listings of about 2,500 of the state's tech-based companies.

As with any research project, Colorado Tech is a work in progress. If we missed your company, or if your listing is incorrect, please visit www.coloradotech.biz to submit your correct data.

Amidst the innovation and growth at your own company, we hope you enjoy this third edition of Colorado Tech.

Cheers, challenges for Colorado's tech industry

BY DALLAS HELTZELL
news@bizwest.com

Fueled by an ever more dynamic mix of research, capital and synergy coupled with a world-renowned quality of life, Colorado's technology sector continues to ride a wave of success and growth.

The question now is how long the boom can last, given more-intense national and international competition and the mounting challenge of finding affordable housing for all those new workers.

Kudos for Colorado are a tale told by the numbers:

- The state ranked fourth in innovation in 2016, according to CompTIA's Cyberstates 2017 report, based on an analysis of new technology patents, tech startups and new tech businesses on a per capita basis.

- Employers in the state's more than 16,000 tech businesses added more than 6,700 new jobs last year, translating to 3.5 percent growth in the sector, according to CompTIA, the Computing Technology Industry Association.

- Its 196,651 workers in tech-related fields at the end of 2016 — about 7.8 percent of the overall state workforce — placed Colorado 14th in the nation, not bad for a state that ranks 22nd in overall population. Technology-related jobs in other industries numbered an estimated 167,400.

- High-tech employment accounted for more than 7 percent of all jobs in Boulder in 2016, as well as 3.4 percent in Fort Collins and Longmont, 3.3 percent in Denver and 3.1 percent in Colorado Springs.

- Leading tech occupations in the state include application software developers, computer user support specialists and systems software developers, according to CompTIA, while the strongest year-over-year job growth is seen in Internet services, computer systems design and information technology services.

- In 2015, Colorado's Office of Economic Development and International Trade ranked the state third for concentration of high-tech workers, fourth for high-tech performance, fourth for tech-related startup activity and fourth for its STEM-based economic activity.

- Boulder had the highest density of technology startups in the nation on a Forbes list of tech hubs.

- The number of jobs in information technology and software in metro Denver increased 9.4 percent last year, ranking it eighth nationally, according to the Metro Denver Economic Development Corp., which added that those jobs over the past five years were up 27.5 percent, outpaced only by the beverage-production industry. Metro Denver ranked fourth for clean-tech jobs and fifth for telecommunications employment.

- Colorado ranked sixth among states that had received the most venture capital in 2015, according to a report by the research firm CB Insights. It said Denver tech startups led the pack that attracted more than $800 million in venture-capital funding in 2015, outpacing energy, food and marijuana companies.

- The tech sector accounts for about $36.2 billion, or 11.5 percent, of the overall state economy, according to the CompTIA report.

- Colorado ranks 10th nationally in average annual tech-industry wages at $106,900, nearly double the average state wage of $54,100.

- Three of the state's urban centers ranked in the top 15 in the nation out of 370 American cities on NerdWallet's list of "Best Places for Tech Jobs." Boulder placed fifth, the Denver-Aurora-Broomfield area was 13th and Colorado Springs came in 15th. The Fort Collins-Loveland area was rated 40th.

That last statistic highlights the challenge for Colorado.

Sure, Boulder — with 70 of every 1,000 of its jobs in the tech industry — can brag about its access to federal research labs, cutting-edge research universities, Nobel laureates, venture-capital dynamos such as Foundry Group and Techstars, and its stunning mountain backdrop.

Sure, entities such as OEDIT, the Advanced Industry Accelerator Grant Program and Colorado's Technology Industry Alliance promote the state as a technology hub and help its small businesses compete, create jobs and drive innovation.

But that's not the whole picture.

"Being the best place for someone working in technology isn't always about making a lot of money," said Sreekar Jasthi, an analyst for NerdWallet. "At the same time, it's relative to the cost of living."

Two of the four areas that ranked above

Boulder on NerdWallet's list — California's Silicon Valley at the top and the Seattle area in fourth — had average monthly rents that were higher than Boulder's and Denver's. That helps explain why the Colorado cities continue to attract companies from out of state, especially the trendy but pricey San Francisco Bay area.

Two others, however — Huntsville, Ala., at No. 2 and North Carolina's "Research Triangle" at No. 4 — boasted substantially cheaper median annual rents, even though their average tech salaries both were in a few thousand dollars of Boulder's and Denver's.

Huntsville, closely tied to the U.S. space program, boasted an average tech salary of $92,296.22 but average monthly rents of only $725, less than three-fourths of the four-figure tabs facing Boulder and Denver renters. Other up-and-coming tech competitors that boast high salaries but vastly cheaper costs of living include Salt Lake City, Indianapolis and the Kansas City area in Missouri and Kansas as well as Jacksonville, Fla., and Charlotte, N.C..

Austin, Texas, which ranked ninth on NerdWallet's list, has set the nation's fastest pace for generating tech jobs. Companies there expanded employment by 41 percent from 2001 to 2013.

Colorado still can counter with its quality-of-life mantra — but as a 2001 article about the state in Newsweek magazine noted, "If you sell your quality of life too hard, too many people show up and ruin it."

Other challenges for Colorado's tech industry include maintaining the pipeline of new tech workers with STEM skills and ensuring that the workforce is diverse in terms of gender and ethnicity.

Although technology jobs are thriving nationwide, a working paper issued this summer by the National Bureau of Economic Research suggested that a shortage of critical thinking, analysis and problem-solving skills still remains — skills often associated with the STEM fields: science, technology, engineering and mathematics. The report illustrated how STEM education leads to a workforce that's more productive overall, not just in STEM industries.

In terms of diversity, a 2016 survey of 680 founders and executives of companies which had been started within the past seven years revealed that good intentions hadn't necessarily translated into results. Although 92 percent of the execs said they were familiar with the term "unconscious bias," 81 percent said diversity enhances creativity, 67 percent said it improves problem solving in the workplace, and 72 percent called it "extremely or very important," nearly a third still reported having no women or minorities in technology-related jobs and only 23 percent believed that diversity improved a company's financial performance.

Looking forward, the demand for telecom jobs has flattened out a bit in Colorado, but steady growth has been seen in IT and custom software services, engineering, research and development, testing services, data science, tech manufacturing and packaged software.

As terror threats and infamous instances of hacking dominate the news cycles, cybersecurity also is likely to be a profitable field for Colorado's tech sector, including companies such as LogRhythm, Webroot and ProtectWise. That prospect led Gov. John Hickenlooper to travel to Israel in fall 2015 as part of an international tour to promote the state.

"The Cyberstates data affirms the strength and vitality of Colorado's tech industry, and attests to its essential standing in the economy," said Todd Thibodeaux, president and chief executive of CompTIA, in a release that accompanied its report. "Technology enables innovation and generates growth for companies, regardless of their size, locale or markets served."

Colorado companies help to propel fledgling drone industry forward

BY JENSEN WERLEY
jwerley@bizwest.com

LONGMONT — When it comes to the drone industry, Colorado is a leading state for operators per capita.

Before the Federal Aviation Administration authorized the commercial use of drones, operators had to get an exemption to fly commercially. Colorado had more of those than any state in the country, said Jay Lindell, an aerospace champion at the Colorado Office of Economic Development and International Trade, and moderator at Longmont Startup Week's panel on the state of drones in Colorado.

Lindell added that Colorado is one of 11 states that have enacted no laws regulating the operations of unmanned aerial systems, instead opting to support the growing business sector.

Despite Colorado's acceptance and openness to drones, the fledgling industry is still very much in its early days and therefore faces challenges.

One of those biggest challenges can be the lack of federal regulatory framework. Right now, there are no mandates on the type of testing required for drones, said Constantin Diehl, president and CEO of UAS Colorado, which lobbies on behalf of the industry.

Many companies building hardware for drones are small and don't have the resources to pay for testing. Many companies rely on simulations. But Diehl said to follow best practices today, there is a component of testing and complying. And Colorado is poised to be the ideal location to conduct tests.

"What better than an environment where you can have high altitudes, low temperatures, difficult terrain," Diehl said.

He added that he expects testing regulations to come down in the next few years, although the timeframe is uncertain.

Another challenge to drones can be security.

Hacking, either communications or a drone's GPS system, is a concern to Jack Elston, CEO of drone company Black Swift Technologies.

"If there's a need of security, there are very secure radio systems that can be used," Elston said. "But there are boxes you can put on the side of your house to make a drone land. GPS jamming and spoofing is a concern, because the primary way of knowing where drones are is through GPS.

There are people who try to intentionally interfere with the aircraft.”

Even corporate espionage can be a concern, he added. Drones collect data on their flight patterns and information they collect, and it can be a concern if that information is actually being uploaded to the company where it's intended to go.

With the challenges, there are companies that are working to combat it. DJI has a huge market saturation in small, amateur-pilot drones. To prevent interfering with commercial flight patterns — especially with manned aircraft — DJI drones are adding algorithms that keep them from flying within airport zones, said Skip Miller, founder and CEO of UASUSA. That technology will be extremely useful, as the popularity of drones continues to grow.

Ultimately, drones can be incredibly useful, especially in a state such as Colorado. Allen Bishop, CEO and president of Reference Technologies Inc., is donating one of his large fixed-wing aircraft to Boulder County to be used for constant 360-degree visuals during the fire season.

Bishop said his drones have been used in search and recoveries for backpackers and in vehicle extractions in reservoirs.

“Next year, we're going to have someone who is bitten by a snake that is off the grid in the middle of nowhere, where we can't get a chopper out. We'll be able to run a drone to Boulder hospital, put a snakebite package together and drop it to the hiker from a drone using their GPS coordinates from their call,” Bishop said. “That's next year, absolutely. It's already happening in other places.”

As the industry is continuing to evolve, drone operators and manufacturers are looking forward to technology evolving with it. Bishop said he's expecting longer-lasting lithium batteries and lightweight fuel cells to come online in the near future, allowing for longer flight times. Machine learning on drones is another future event that is expected.

But the biggest thing panelists wanted to touch on was how new the industry still is.

“What's interesting is three out of four of these panelists are inventors,” Miller said. “It's interesting that we forget that part. All of the industry is not figured out. On a daily basis, new things appear. We're at the start of this.”

“GPS jamming and spoofing is a concern, because the primary way of knowing where drones are is through GPS. There are people who try to intentionally interfere with the aircraft.”

Startup creating platform for patents, crowdfunding, idea protection

“People are running Kickstarter campaigns with no protection of their ideas.”

Joe Oldenburg
Chief Technology Officer
IdeaJam

BY JENSEN WERLEY
jwerley@bizwest.com

DENVER — A new startup is looking to make patents more accessible and intellectual property more protected.

IdeaJam, a company that operates in Denver and Boulder, has a new platform that aims to make turning an idea into a business easier.

The service is a one-stop shop for many needs, said Chief Technology Officer Joe Oldenburg. It provides a secure format for creatives to work on their ideas, without the threat of losing their intellectual property. It also lets them share it with others, even including an NDA for possible collaborators to sign before they can access any documents. The main goal of the service is to make patent applications more accessible, by affordably — $75 versus hundreds of dollars — generating patent applications and then connecting users with the lawyers who can help them. The service also includes a crowdfunding component, so customers can use the same platform they used for generating and planning their idea for getting it funded.

Jeff Schell

Joe Oldenburg

“Our most valuable aspect is we enable people to build their patent quickly,” Oldenburg told BizWest. “Getting a patent is expensive and there are lots of barriers. People are running Kickstarter campaigns with no protection of their ideas. We’re geared to store ideas in a safe, private way.”

The company is still in its beta stage, developing the software. But IdeaJam plans to have its big debut at Denver Startup Week Sept. 25-29, where it will host a workshop on patent applications.

IdeaJam was started by Oldenburg and Jeff Schell, a Denver lawyer who started Rocky Mountain and saw firsthand the barriers to creators for filing patent applications.

Oldenburg said the service protects users ideas by automatically privatizing and encrypting documents. Users can manage their privacy settings, and choose to share with certain collaborators. And unlike services like LegalZoom, which can help supply patent documents, Oldenburg said IdeaJam goes beyond that, connecting users with others who may be able to help build their business.

The service is free to store ideas and documents, or users can pay a $75 fee to download their patent application.

IdeaJam is also partnering with other organizations. The startup recently went through the TiE Rockies accelerator and is working with Rockies Venture Club to help its companies manage their intellectual property.

The company, which has been bootstrapping itself and plans to continue to do so, has plans to grow after its Denver Startup Week debut.

“In the next year, we’re planning for steady revenue growth and to develop our community,” Oldenburg said. “We’re really excited about the collaboration aspect: to connect other inventors and have steady community participation across Colorado.”

Two-man company in Fort Collins innovating backup cameras for autos

BY JENSEN WERLEY
 jwerley@bizwest.com

FORT COLLINS — A small tech company run by two former Hewlett-Packard engineers has figured out a way to design a simple, easy-install, nearly wireless backup camera for cars.

Trail Ridge Technologies LLC is a Fort Collins-based company consisting of Bob Morain and Mitch Hanks, both of whom took early retirement from H-P in 2008. Hanks, a hardware engineer, and Morain, a software engineer, partnered to create a company that would simplify complex products and bring them into people's lives.

After experimenting with marketing a few different products, including an MP3 player, electronic note taker and handheld scanner, Trail Ridge wanted to move beyond marketing and create its own product.

The QuickVu camera came from a tragic personal story: As a teenager, Morain was in the car when a friend's mom stopped at a roadside stand. Morain said it could have only taken a minute, but as the woman went to back up her car, she didn't know that in the time she was out a two-year-old girl was behind the vehicle.

Morain said the image of the girl being struck stayed with him all this time, and so Trail Ridge took the opportunity to bridge the gap between cars that have built-in cameras for hefty packages or cameras that can be installed with heavy rewiring and drilling into the vehicle.

After a few wired and radio wave-based models, Trail Ridge debuted its latest iteration — The QuickVu Digital has one cord that connects it to the car's cigarette lighter. The rest is wireless.

It's the only truly wireless camera, Morain said, and that's because it operates unlike any camera of its kind.

Unlike most backup cameras, which are connected to the car's reverse lights to know when the car is in reverse and therefore when the camera must be in operation, Trail Ridge's product uses a little deductive reasoning to know when it needs to work.

"Our camera does not know if the car is in reverse, it has to guess," Morain told BizWest. "But most backing is done when the car is just turned on, we found. So when the power outlet is switched on when the car is started, our monitor is turned on and sends a signal to the camera. Depending on preferences, after 15 seconds to two minutes, it turns off. And in rare instances when you do want to back up and the car is already on, you just tap a button on the monitor."

The seemingly simple solution lets Trail Ridge offer a camera that's a reasonable price — $259 for the 4.3 inch monitor and camera, which mounts to the license plate and is powered by AA batteries. Unlike previous models of the QuickVu, which used radio transmissions, this latest model's point-to-point digital system can't be interrupted by bluetooth or cell phone calls. Unlike other company's products, Morain said this product doesn't need to be spliced into a car's wiring, meaning a simple install that doesn't require an outside professional to drill into a vehicle and rewire.

"We can't keep them in stock," Morain said, who added there are about 50 orders pending. Moving forward, the company has ramped up production to keep up and is promoting the camera through targeted ads and a TV spot.

"We just ran out of stock again," he said. "It's going crazy right now."

UCAR, NREL to co-anchor The Innovation Corridor at WTC Denver

BY DOUG STORUM
dstorum@bizwest.com

BOULDER — The University Corporation for Atmospheric Research and the National Renewable Energy Laboratory have agreed to set up shop at the World Trade Center Denver campus when it opens in 2019.

UCAR, based in Boulder, and NREL, based in Golden, will co-anchor The Innovation Corridor, a platform designed to connect federally funded labs with private industry to foster economic development and job creation.

The trade center at 38th Avenue and Blake Street in Denver's River North neighborhood is being developed by Formativ LLC, a Denver-based real estate and community development. The World Trade Center Denver will have a mix of WTC services, business headquarters, education, retail space and cultural events. Construction on the $200 million project is expected to begin late this year, and the first of three phases will open in 2019, according to Formativ.

"The resources associated with these two labs are unlike anything else in the world," said Eric Drummond, president of global strategy and chief legal officer of Formativ. "We are absolutely thrilled to have them as founding partners of The Innovation Corridor."

COURTESY FORMATIV LLC

The U.S. Department of Energy's NREL is the federal government's primary laboratory dedicated to research, development, commercialization, and deployment of renewable-energy and energy-efficiency technologies.

UCAR manages NCAR on behalf of the National Science Foundation. It helps raise awareness of the value of federal investment in the Earth systems science community, including improved forecasts of weather, water, climate and solar storms.

The Innovation Corridor will allow scientists to demonstrate their technology and meet with potential business partners and investors.

"Private companies throughout the Front Range and beyond will now be able to harness breakthroughs by our scientists more effectively, thanks to this new partnership," UCAR' president, Antonio J. Busalacchi, said in a prepared statement. He said The Innovation Corridor will "leverage cutting-edge science in ways that will generate jobs, advance technologies needed to protect life and property, and boost U.S. competitiveness in the global economy."

Symmetry Storage plans to grow its app for storage solutions 'city by city'

People looking for rental space can browse Stow's peer-to-peer market, where those who have space to lease can name their price and list their options.

"A business plan makes you think about everything and prove your feasibility."

Devin Eldridge
chief executive
Symmetry Storage LLC

Symmetry Storage is a small company — Eldridge just hired Carmelo Mannino as director of growth three months ago. The company hasn't gone through any incubator or accelerator, which means Eldridge learned how to pitch on his own, and through informal mentorship from Colpaart.

"I just really stuck to the criteria provided and prepared for it, and listened to feedback from other people," he said.

Symmetry Storage made it to the final five, and on April 28 it provided a high-level pitch to judges and won the $25,000 first prize.

Eldridge said that the money will go to growing the app's presence city by city. Although the app can be used anywhere, most of its customers who are offering rental space are in Northern Colorado or Denver.

The storage marketplace — think Airbnb, but for leasing storage space — is a fragmented field, Eldridge said, with two other apps in Canada and not much else in the United States. That means plenty of room for competition and growing in Colorado, he said.

In addition to marketing, the company is considering adding new features to its app and possibly partnering with a storage-unit partner.

"We're doing a lot with a few resources," he said. "We have the ability to continue to grow the product. We're going to build it city by city."

BY JENSEN WERLEY
jwerley@bizwest.com

WINDSOR — Stow, an app for finding parking and storage from peers, won the University of Northern Colorado Monfort College of Business' Entrepreneurial Challenge April 28, but the journey actually started back at Thanksgiving.

It was the first time Devin Eldridge, chief executive of Windsor-based Symmetry Storage LLC, whose background is as a licensed CPA, had to write a formal business plan.

"A business plan makes you think about everything and prove your feasibility," Eldridge said. "It's painful, but good to go through and think about how your business should operate."

When Symmetry Storage applied for the MCB Challenge in November, it was just a two-year-old company run by Eldridge and his brother Dillon, who is chief technology officer.

The app works as a marketplace, partnering those who need space for storage with those who would like to rent out a garage, shed, parking spot or other potential free space.

The idea started when Devin was moving from Fort Collins to Windsor, and needed storage for just three days. But the shortest term he could find was a self-storage unit for a whole month, for which he had to pay $400.

He started working on the idea as a side project and took it on full-time a year ago, leaving his job at Otterbox.

At the urging of last year's winner, The Food Corridor's CEO, Ashley Colpaart, and as a way to build the company and get an influx of funds without giving away equity, Eldridge entered his business plan during the first round of the challenge over Thanksgiving.

By the end of December, he had heard back that his app was selected for the next round, which required a 15 minute in-depth pitch and 15 minute Q-and-A.
