► Welcome to what I would humbly call the best-ever International Dredging Directory (IDD). Just in time for this edition, IHS Markit has audited the dredging vessel data it holds and designated more vessels with a distinct type, which previously have been classed as miscellaneous dredgers.

This audit also resulted in the inclusion of especially more grab dredgers that have, in previous years, been left out of the IDD. In addition, the dredging companies have been thoroughly vetted to include the most up-to-date contact information.

Diving into the data, 1,785 dredgers that have an IMO number are currently in service.

The biggest share of the fleet is made of trailing suction hopper dredgers (TSHDs), which has been the case for the past few years, too. The other two main types of dredgers remain cutter suction dredgers (CSDs) and grab dredgers.

We have seen an overall increase of vessel numbers from 1,406 in 2019 to 1,785 in 2020 as mentioned above, which is due to the upgraded IHS Markit database rather than newbuilding vessels entering into service.

Speaking of newbuilds, 29 dredgers with IMO numbers are under construction, which includes statuses on order, keel laid, and launched.

Of those, 22 are TSHDs, CSDs; and two water-injection dredgers.

As we have seen in previous years, there is again a race under way between the Netherlands and China to secure contracts to build vessels. Currently, eight vessels are under construction in the Netherlands and six in China.

Other popular shipbuilding countries such as Lithuania, Romania, and Singapore are also currently working on several newbuilds. In Brazil, Germany, Spain, the US, and Uruguay, each have one vessel under construction.

In terms of size of these vessels, the TSHDs range from small to large vessels based on the IDD criteria, which means no jumbo or mega vessels with a hopper capacity of 15,000 m<sup>3</sup> and over are currently being built. Two CSDs edge on the mega-IDD-class for cutters with a total installed power of 23,000 kW and more.

With the COVID-19 pandemic also presenting challenges to the dredging industry, with uncertainty over future contracts for big capital projects, the need for powerful vessels might have come under scrutiny. At the same time, the number of orders made this year has not been influenced too much. At the time of press, five vessels have been ordered in 2020, which does not deviate too much from the number of orders made in previous years.

All the above and other data, we have turned into handy visualisations to give an overview of average capacities of different dredger types as well as the average age of the fleet. You can find the infographics on pages 28–31.

Regardless of COVID-19, projects such as the Elbe River deepening in Germany and maintenance schemes in Australia and the US have continued over the past months. However, travel restrictions and the lack of unified rules for crew changes have – as in other maritime sectors – resulted in dredging crew spending additional time on board. □

The dredger fleet visualised

On the following pages, we have illustrated some of the data behind the IDD. In total, 1,785 dredgers that have an IMO number are in service. The biggest share of the fleet is made up of TSHDs, which has been the case for the past years, too. The other two main types of dredgers are CSDs and grab dredgers.

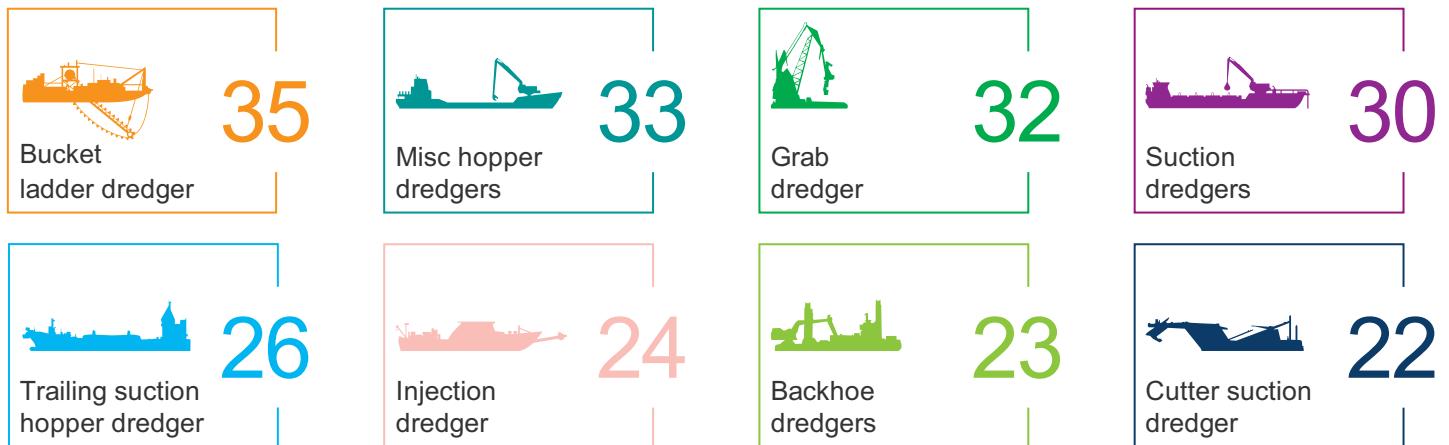

Looking at the first graphic below, the overall vessel numbers has increased from 1,406 in 2019 to 1,785 in 2020. This is because IHS Markit has upgraded its database to include and designate more vessels with a distinct type, which previously have been classed as miscellaneous dredgers. Moreso, this audit has resulted in the inclusion of grab dredgers especially, as it has been left out of the IDD in previous years.

The remaining visualisations give an overview of selected information on average capacities of different dredger types alongside the average age of the fleet.

Dredgers under construction

In total, 29 dredgers with IMO numbers are under construction, which includes statuses on order, keel laid, and launched. Of those, 22 are TSHDs, five CSDs, and two water-injection dredgers.

As in previous years, there is a race between the Netherlands and China to secure contracts to build vessels. Currently, eight vessels are under construction in the Netherlands and six in China. Other popular shipbuilding countries such as Lithuania, Romania, and Singapore also currently working on several newbuilding vessels. In Brazil, Germany, Spain, the United States, and Uruguay, each has one vessel under construction.

The TSHDs range from small to large vessels, which means no jumbo or mega vessels with a hopper capacity of 15,000 m<sup>3</sup> and over are on order. Two CSDs edge on the mega-IDD-class for cutters with a total installed power of 23,000 kW and more.

Classification types

Listed according to the main classification types, beginning with trailing suction hopper dredgers (TSHDs), the characteristics given are designed to enable quick pinpointing of the type of dredger(s) most suitable for the project in hand

► We've made that process easier by putting the four major dredger types into the 'divisions' most commonly referred to by the industry and colour-coding them. And you'll find a key on the bottom of relevant pages for at-a-glance reference.

The directory contains selected information on all known propelled seagoing dredgers in the world fleet abstracted from the World Register of Ships, the single most authoritative ship database on global merchant and military ships. And it contains details of other dredgers that do not conform to the definitions required to be listed under the World Register and that therefore do not qualify for IMO ship identity numbers. This latter selection is included for your further reference.
